YOUR “JOURNAL JOURNEY” BEGINS HERE...

The University subscribes to thousands of periodicals for you to use while you are a student here. So make the most of them and get ahead with your research.

There are three main types:

- Newspapers
- Magazines
- Academic Journals

Most are now available online through our library web page but many are still available in hard copy.
MAGAZINES

A frequent publication which includes topical material likely to be of general interest to any reader.
Title of journal and details of the issue. Given many issues are published within a year, it’s vital to note this information in your bibliography.

Length of article. In this case, 14 pages long.

Read the full article or download it.

Heard of Peer Review? Many scholarly journals go through a more rigorous editorial process than magazines. To find out if articles have been peer reviewed, look for information about the journal.

Body of the article. This article is 14 pages long.

Unlike magazines, journal articles will end with a list of references to indicate the depth of research that went into writing the article.

Title of the journal article and the authors of the article.

The Abstract

The Abstract

References

Academic journals unlike magazines usually include an abstract to enable you to come to a judgement of how useful it might be before reading the full text.

Academic journals are published frequently but with a more scholarly intended readership. They are written by academics for other academics. They are sometimes “peer reviewed” and go through a more rigorous editorial process to check suitability for inclusion.